Open-plan vs. closed-plan offices

Which is better?

For most companies, the design of their office space is very important. The office space should help employees work more efficiently, concentrate on their work, and work better in a team. There are two common designs — closed-plan offices and open-plan offices.

Open-plan offices are good for companies for a number of reasons. First, they cost less because they use less space and electricity for heating and cooling. Additionally, businesses can save on equipment because people share resources such as printers and photocopiers. Since there are no walls or barriers between workstations, staff can learn from each other and interact more efficiently. For example, when you work in an open-plan office you can get feedback on your work instantly and you can ask questions without needing to knock on doors. Increased collaboration between employees can also result in business innovation.

On the other hand, many employees prefer closed-plan offices, mainly because there is less noise making it easier to concentrate. With a busy open-plan office, the high level of noise can make it difficult for employees to focus on their work. Another advantage for business is a lower rate of absenteeism. When people work in an open-plan environment, there is a greater risk of catching a virus when someone is sick. And when employees are absent, the company is less productive.
